

REMARKS

[01] It was insightful to see that the claims could be interpreted as reading on a home page. Obviously, the Examiner knows this wasn't the intended interpretation, but was correct in applying the broadest possible reasonable interpretation. Applicants have endeavored to amend the claims to preclude them reading on a home page by requiring the original and updated versions to be (in effect) on different computer systems. Any further suggestions by the Examiner in this regard would be welcome.

[02] Traversal

[03] Apparently, all claims are rejected for anticipation by U.S. Patent Publication 2004/0246946 to Nelson et al., "Nelson" herein. In response to these rejections, all claims have been amended (either directly or by virtue of dependency), so the outstanding rejections are technically moot. To advance prosecution on the merits, the rejections are traversed as though they were applied to the amended claims.

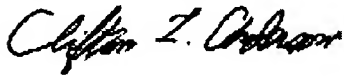

[04] All claims now require an original version of a document file to be located on a computer system and an updated version of the document file to be located on a network site not including the computer system. Accordingly, the two versions must be on different computers (at least when the updated version is first accessed).

[05] The Office Action asserts that the claims read on an index or home page disclosed by Nelson. The original version of the home page is what exists when the client accesses it the first time. The updated version of the home page is what exists when the client accesses it the next time, as home pages are frequently updated. However, the two versions of the home page would presumably be located on the same computer, so the "different computer" limitation of the claims is not met.

[06] Since Nelson does not disclose that the original and updated version of the index file or home page are on different computers ("computer system" versus "network site not including the computer system"), Nelson does not anticipate the invention as defined in the claims. Accordingly, it is respectfully submitted that all claims are allowable and allowance of the application in its present form is respectfully requested.

Respectfully submitted

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read "Clifton L. Anderson".

Clifton L. Anderson
Reg. No. 30,989
(408) 257-6070